North and south passenger trains make close connections at Galisteo Junction for Santa Fe.

Branch to Santa Fe.

Trains meet at Watrous and dine here.

All freight for the North or South must be delivered at the depot at 4 p. m.—local time. The cause of this is that freight cannot be billed to go by next day trains.

The Adams Express office will be open from 8 until 2.

C. P. HOVEY, Agent.

Major Smith is the great character of West Las Animas. He is a tailor by trade, but possesses many accomplishments beyond the bare ability to use the needle and shears. His great forte is story-telling. He is a native of London, and in that city began his work as a tailor. He represents that he was frequently visited by the attaches of Punch, who made good use of his stories for publication. Writing of the Major, a correspondent of the Tribune says: "He has evidently been an attentive reader and close observer; is possessed of a wonderfully retentive memory and a well-stored mind; he is as familiar with the writings of Addison, Macaulay and Stuart Buckie as most people are with Bret Harte or as children are with Mother Goose, and he can repeat page after page of Moor and Wordsworth, frequently with apt improvisations of his own. Neither is humor liking to him in a rich vein, nor a full vocabulary of honest Saxon words. He is conversant and takes a deep interest in current politics; knows accurately the gist of the latest speeches, not only of Garfield and Conkling, but of Bright and Foster. I rather guess there have been few story-tellers since Walter Scott equal to Major Smith, unless it be 'Timothy Titcomb' of Scribner, and a few others. I have sat up nearly all night on a few occasions (every man in the party sober, too) listening to the Major's stories drawn from English history and from American and English contemporary life, and I have never heard him tell the same story twice. If it is not genius it certainly is one of the rarest of talents."—Denver Tribune.
